Short Stories For Evening Hours

OPEN CONFESSION

Seaside pensions are rare places to pick up a suitable wife. Oh, you may laugh, no doubt you are thinking of the many ridiculous stories trotted out every year about the summer girls and seaside courtships that end with the vacation and are forgotten on the way home.

But why should vows of love and devotion be less sincere when spoken by the sea? It is all nonsense. Now listen!

She was just the sweetest bit of femininity that ever looked up from a pension table d'hôte to notice a newcomer. I was the newcomer. My name is Jacques Dubois of no particular occupation, thanks to a foolish old father who scraped and stunted during the best years of his life to provide for his only son, and I had gone down to Trouville more by way of an experiment than the idea of getting any enjoyment out of the visit.

There are no stupid conventionalities at the seaside to mar the progress of an acquaintance. If you fall in love—mean if you take a fancy to a nice girl, you appropriate her quietly, but firmly, and set about the pleasant task of giving her a good time—that is what I did.

Mlle. Claire Desaix, that being full name, was the orphan daughter of an army officer who had died, leaving her not too well off, but comfortably provided for. Further, the reason for her not being chaperoned was a reluctance to accompany her maiden aunt to Baden-Baden, which had ended in open rebellion and flight to Trouville. This little story she poured into me as a special mark of confidence the night of my introduction.

After we had known each other a few days, I noticed a growing reticence about her escapade. To tell the truth, I think she was sorry she had told me—yes, I knew she was.

We did Trouville and the surrounding neighborhood thoroughly, every place of interest was visited; we poked about old ruins, went for moonlight trips on the steamers; we danced at Kursaal, we gladdened the heart of every itinerant performer who claimed our patronage, and finally we fell in love with each other.

I make no excuse for this apparent weakness on my part. To see her dear face tanned by the sun, her sweet lips parted in a cupid's bow, drinking in health and happiness, would have conquered stronger hearts than mine, so two days before her departure I asked her to be my wife.

It was a beautiful moonlight night, and as we sat together on the cliffs we could hear the soft strains of music from the band that played on the distant pier.

"Claire," I whispered, and my arm stole around her tiny waist. "I love you, dear, and I want you to be my wife, that I may go on loving and protecting you forever."

I waited for a moment to hear her reply, and as none came I turned her face towards me and saw she was in tears.

"What is the matter, darling? Have I hurt your feelings?" But still no reply.

"Answer me, dear," I urged. "Do you love me?" And as I bent my head and listened breathlessly I heard a feeble "Yes." Then she raised her tearstained face and I knew she had spoken truly.

"Then you will be my wife?" I cried, joyously.

She shook her head. "No, Jacques," she sobbed, "I can never, never be any more to you than I am now."

I turned away with a groan of anguish; then faced her again, for a thought flashed across my mind.

"You are engaged to some other fellow, and all this time you have been making a fool of me. Oh, it was cruel when you could see how much I cared for you."

"No, dear, that is not the reason." "Then there is nothing to prevent our marriage if you really care for me," I cried, trying to seize her hands.

"I am going away tomorrow, Jacques. I will write and tell you all." "I want to know now—I have a right to know."

"Please turn your head away, then," she began, "and promise me faithfully you won't look at me." "I promise."

"You will never want to look at me again when you know what a bad, wicked girl I am," she cried.

"It must be nothing short of murder then," I answered, brutally cheerful.

"When I first saw you at the pension," she began, "I could see that you liked me, and you looked so grand, so different from other men, and I was afraid you would think anything of me if you knew really who I was—and, oh, my father is not dead—he was not an army officer—he is only a car-carpenter and—"

"One live carpenter is worth a hundred dead army officers," I exclaimed solemnly.

"And I never ran away from a maiden aunt who wanted me to go to Baden-Baden. And I have not any fortune, and I had to shive up for six months to come down here—"

Then she broke down, and as I took her in my arms I could feel her little heart beating rapidly against mine.

"You dear little fool," I said, kissing her lips. "I knew that was only a joke, because while you were telling it to me something slipped from your pocket as you drew out your handkerchief—"

"What was it, Jacques?" she asked, bewildered.

"Something that said you were a brave little worker and made me respect you a great deal more than if you had really been rich."

"Do tell me what it was, Jacques."

"There, now."

I drew from my pocket a slip of cardboard and read:

"Mlle. Claire Desaix, No. 108 Boulevard Menilmontant, Paris."—Roual Duval in Woman's National Daily.

COELHO GETS FIRE-ENGINE FOR MAUI

Senator Coelho, who is also the chief of the Waikiki-Kahului fire department, has secured a fire engine for that city. The engine will be for the use of the Kahului and Waikiki people, though it will be stationed for the present in Kahului. The Senator says that this will be done because Waikiki has a water pressure that would last for half an hour, the time necessary for the transportation by train of the engine from Kahului.
